FDIC Deposit Assessment Proposal on Brokered Deposits May Adversely Impact Banking Industry, Individual Institutions

As part of a larger proposal published in the Federal Register on November 24, 2010, the FDIC is proposing to add a 25 basis point insurance premium on all “large” ($10 billion in assets or more) banks. The fee will apply to the use of brokered deposits in excess of 10% of total domestic deposits. Comments are due on January 3, 2011. We believe that this proposal could have significant adverse effects on a number of banks, large and small, and also lead to changes in the business models and behavior of banks that could directly conflict with the Congressional mandate in Dodd-Frank and earlier legislation.

It is important to begin the discussion by noting that at the FDIC, brokered deposits are viewed as problematic and as the leading source of potential loss to the industry. The FDIC's rationale for imposing a "Brokered Deposit Adjustment" to insurance premium assessments appears to rest on two assumptions: (i) some recently failed institutions experienced rapid asset growth before failure and may have funded that growth with brokered deposits; and (ii) the FDIC claims a "significant correlation" between rapid asset growth funded by brokered deposits and the probability of an institution's CAMELS rating being downgraded.

Currently, all Risk Category I banks are subject to a deposit insurance premium adjustment only if (1) brokered deposits exceed 10% of domestic deposits and (2) the bank has had asset growth of more than 40% during the prior four years. The current rule does not impose a pre-determined premium on brokered deposits. Instead, the brokered deposit and growth data are incorporated into a bank's overall risk profile for purposes of determining the bank's ultimate level of deposit insurance premiums. That is, the current deposit insurance premium for brokered deposits is a function of the bank's performance.

Under the new proposal, “small” banks would continue to use the current premium adjustment formula, but all other banks with assets > $10 billion would see their premiums on the use of brokered deposits above 10% of domestic deposits increased by 25bp. There is no explicit measure for rapid growth and/or other institution-specific factors which can contribute to the failure of a depository.

Below is our take on the proposal and why the FDIC has chosen to take this radical and somewhat inexplicable course. We also discuss how this rule, if adopted, will negatively impact a number of banks and also make structural changes in the bank funding market that have neither been fully investigated by the FDIC nor blessed by Congress.

- The FDIC is required by the Dodd/Frank Act to study its definition of “core deposits” and “brokered deposits” for purposes of FDIC premiums and to report to Congress by July 2011. As one lawyer responding to the notice opined, “adoption of the FDIC insurance premium proposal prior to completion of the study is in conflict with the Congressional mandate and raises the possibility that the study will be conducted to justify the premium.” We agree.
- The FDIC has offered no explanation for the statement in its proposal regarding the threat from ALL brokered deposits and no justification is readily apparent. Of the 191 depository institutions that failed in 2009 and 2010 only 6 were “large” and of those, only 4 had brokered deposits of 10% or less. While the FDIC is correct that brokered deposits can be the source of unsafe and unsound banking practices, the proposed rule no longer differentiates between high-growth, unstable institution and those banks that make prudent use of brokered funds. A spreadsheet showing all FDIC insured depositories with brokered deposits in excess of 10% of total assets and/or domestic deposits is attached to this report.
- The FDIC continues to use the legal definition of “brokered deposits” as meaning a deposit facilitated by a third party. This broad brush approach is apparently a substitute for accurately describing the underlying financial and market attributes of a bank’s liabilities. Many deposits that are brokered (e.g., “sweep deposits,” long-term CDs and “reciprocal” deposits) are a stable, low cost source of deposit funding, while deposits that are not brokered (e.g., deposits obtained through a listing service or over internet) are high cost and potentially volatile. For example, the FDIC does not recognize or distinguish between the attributes of these various types of deposits based upon such risk-based indicia as price, maturity and the conditions and/or fees placed upon early redemption.
- Moreover, the proposal does no impose any penalty cost on advances from the Federal Home Loan Banks, a funding source that has caused significant losses to the Deposit Insurance Fund (“DIF”) and is of at least of equal concern to regulators, investors and bank counterparties. Indeed, the relatively high cost and excessive collateral requirements of FHLB advances arguably makes this source of funding more problematic than all types of deposits, brokered or core. If as a matter of public policy the FDIC wants to impose a penalty upon banks that utilize brokered deposits, then fairness and intellectual consistency argue in favor of imposing at least the same penalty rate on banks that use FHLB advances above 10% of total assets. The current threshold of explicit regulatory concern regarding FHLB advances is 15% of total assets.

- Moreover, if we are right about how this proposal will negatively affect the use of brokered deposits generally, then it is likely that the FDIC will be forced to amend its assessment formula in the next several years in order to make up for a revenue shortfall as the level of brokered deposits in the industry declines. The FDIC proposal is entirely silent as to their expectations for market use of brokered deposits should this rule be adopted as currently proposed.
- Based on discussions with bankers and regulators, we have come to the view that FDIC is trying to do the right thing -- but in the wrong way. The obvious point of departure is the need to enlarge the assessment base, from domestic deposits to assets less Tier 1 capital. This effectively restores some equity to smaller banks, which for decades have borne an excessive proportion of the cost of supporting the DIF vs. larger banks, which typically have more diverse funding sources.
- The FDIC then had to accommodate the needs of large, complex banks by allowing them to reduce somewhat the overall cost of the enlarged deposit assessment base and the deposit insurance premiums that result based on the portion of the balance sheet funded with bonds and other non-deposit sources. Unfortunately, after making these adjustments, the only way to reach the overall funding number sought by the FDIC, first to fund ongoing bank resolutions and then restore the DIF to adequate levels apparently, was to impose a 25bp fee on all large bank brokered deposits in excess of 10% of domestic deposits.
- We see a number of general problems with this proposal, both in terms of equity for all the banks insured and regulated by the FDIC, and also how this proposal is likely to change the banking industry. First and foremost, we do not believe that the FDIC has fully investigated the likely changes in the liability structure of banks should this proposal be adopted. Despite the bad reputation of brokered deposits in the regulatory community, the fact is that most of the deposit liabilities which fall into this category are more stable and lower cost than the alternatives.
- This list of banks in the attached spreadsheet taken from The IRA Bank Monitor includes a wide range of institutions ranging from affiliates of Citigroup (“C”/Q3 2010 Bank Stress Rating “C”/Outlook: “Neutral”). The fact that the FDIC does not distinguish between the various valid financial scenarios for which these different types of funding are employed discredits this important rulemaking effort. Consider some examples:
- Citibank (South Dakota) (Q3 2010 Stress Rating: “D”): The credit card unit of C funds a third of its balance sheet with deposits, almost all of which are brokered. While the bank has a relatively high default rate, which is the main source of the poor stress rating, the unit is stable and has returned to profitability. Under the FDIC proposal, Citibank (South Dakota) would be at the cap for brokered deposits and will likely be forced to substitute non-deposit funding for its current use of brokered funds.

- Goldman Sachs Bank USA (Q3 2010 Stress Rating: “A+”): The bank unit of Goldman Sachs Inc (“GS”/Outlook: “Neutral”) funds 17% of its assets with deposits, but more than half of these are brokered. The GS bank unit is stable, well managed and has little credit exposure, but under the FDIC rule this bank unit would be penalized for its use of brokered funds.
- Morgan Stanley Bank N.A. (Q3 2010 Stress Rating: “A+”): The largest of the bank units of Morgan Stanley Inc. (“MS”/Outlook: “Negative”) funds virtually all of its $85 billion in assets via brokered deposits, largely sweep accounts from MS customers under long-term contracts.
- MetLife Bank N.A. (Q3 2010 Stress Rating “A+”): The $16 billion asset affiliate of MetLife has $9 billion in domestic deposits, of which 21% are brokered deposits under the FDIC proposal.
- Ally Bank (Q3 2010 Stress Rating: “A+”): The affiliate of Ally Financial Inc. fund half of its $66 billion in assets from deposits, of which 30% are brokered. The important observation to make about Ally, however is that the brokered deposits are probably the most stable part of the Ally deposit base.

The last observation about Ally is important because should the FDIC proposal be adopted, the brokered funds market is likely to shrink. In its place, in our view, will spring up a larger and more volatile market for “core” deposits gathered over the internet. Instead of the current low-cost and relatively stable market for brokered funds, the FDIC will encourage the creation of a dozen or more larger direct competitors to Ally and other internet lenders.

Given the high rates and lack of penalties for early withdrawal in the Ally Bank business model, it is difficult to see how such a market evolution will support safety and soundness or the specific requirements of Dodd-Frank. While the Ally profile as of Q3 2010 is very good, it is important to keep in mind that the “core” deposits of this institution are essentially demand deposits and thus potentially very volatile. Again, there are no penalties for early withdrawal in the Ally Bank model and thus no assurance regarding the duration of these funds.

But what the FDIC proposal will do without question is raise the cost of funds and related expenses to many large banks without differentiating between well-managed institutions and those that truly pose a safety and soundness issue to the U.S. banking industry. If there is one aspect of this proposal that bothers us more than anything else, it is the complete lack of risk-based pricing for the premium for brokered deposits. If the FDIC wants to impose a punitive premium on troubled banks using brokered deposits, then we support that entirely. But in our view, the FDIC’s broad brush approach to brokered deposits seems to ill-considered and may be the sources of future losses to the DIF.
