RECEIVED

Dear Mr. Bernanke, Mr. Curry, and Mr. Gruenberg:

I am writing in reference to the joint proposed rules released on June 7, 2012, by the Federal Reserve, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Comptroller of the Currency, that are intended to implement the Basel III regulatory capital reforms from the Basel Committee on Banking Supervision.

I am concerned that the proposed application of the Basel III capital requirements will have a detrimental effect on community banks. While I agree that capital is vital to reduce risk and ensure sound financial institutions in the wake of the economic crisis, any overbroad capital requirement could have a disproportionate impact on community banks that are already practicing responsible lending through adequate capitalization. In effect, this could slow down lending at a critical time in our economic history.

Community banks in my district with significant residential mortgages, while previously considered to be very strongly capitalized, could face capital requirements that are significantly higher. These rules could lead to the consolidation of small community banks, which would displace jobs and reduce credit access for families and small businesses.

Community banks serve the credit and financial needs of rural and small town communities in markets that are not reached by large banks. They provide access to credit for homebuyers and small businesses across New Mexico, and they play a significant role in economic recovery. We need to work to ensure that community banks have support and we have to carefully tailor regulations to avoid regulating these smaller banks out of our communities entirely.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,
