Dear Chairman Bernanke, Comptroller Curry and Acting Chairman Gruenberg:

I commend the recent decision to postpone implementation of the Basel III regulatory capital reforms in order to analyze the feedback the agencies have received on the proposed new regulations. As you engage in this process, I urge you to consider the unique role community banks play in our nation's economy, and the undue burden and potential unintended consequences from the proposed regulations.

In Washington State, community banks play a key role in providing access to credit in all communities, particularly rural areas. Community banks make relationship-based banking decisions in the same markets where their customers live and work, providing localized access to essential funding that enables growth and opportunity for small businesses.

Many community banks acknowledge the need for changes to regulatory capital requirements. However, at a time when there is elevated attention paid to small businesses' ability to access capital in order to keep the economy growing, we must not insert roadblocks that hinder recovery. I am concerned that imposing these new rules could have unintended consequences for community banks, and ultimately result in reduced lending and economic growth in the communities they serve.

The capital requirements in the proposed rule would apply to all banks and thrifts larger than $500 million in assets. The complexity of the proposed rules, drafted to keep large, internationally active institutions from failing, would disproportionately burden community banks. I understand from my constituents in Eastern Washington that many of the provisions appear to present expensive and complex regulatory burdens for community banks without improving the stability of those institutions. Any new rules should distinguish between the size, complexity and risk of the financial institution, especially when implemented in the U.S., where the banking industry is systematically different than it is in European markets.

I agree the re-evaluation of regulatory capital standard is important. However, I believe those standards should not be one-size-fits-all and should not hinder business and consumer access to loans. As the agencies continue to contemplate the proposed rules and in light of this and other comment letters, I urge you to take into consideration the unique role played by community banks and the potential harmful consequences posed by new capital regulations.

Sincerely,

Cathy McMorris Rodgers
Member of Congress
